Proceeding from the Garden of Eden to Egypt Mr. Vincent gave, with some show of being doubtful of the wisdom of doing so, an account of the £70,000 income a Queen of Egypt drew for pin money. "Not a small allowance," he commented, "and if our wives wanted anything approaching it we should have to consider seriously before we left the ranks of the bachelors." Mr. Vincent expressed regret that living in a world "where moth and rust doth corrupt" we cannot gaze upon some of the garments made in those days, but fortunately, he said, some of the oldest records remain in carved stone.

Mr. Vincent's next subject was the Sumptuary Lawe. "There is," he said, "abundant evidence that in all ages beautiful clothing has been very much sought after, and in many ages the rank of the wearer has been indicated by the style of his dress; so that it is no new thing for a man of woman to endeavor to appear to belong to a. better class of society than is actually the case, which leads them to spend vast sums on their society than is actually the case, which leads them to spend vast sums on their apparel beyond what they are able to pay.
